Things Worth Breaking

Kam Gupta*

Diamonds are amongst the hardest things to break. A polished diamond, if broken, loses all its value, beauty and desirability. Diamonds remain a woman's best friend and are considered 'forever' because they are seemingly indestructible. The qualities of a diamond make it desirable not to be broken.

There are some things that are just impossible to break. For example, blood relationships can be denied but are unbreakable. Then there are fragile things which seem to have high emotional value attached with them and tend to hurt more when broken, e.g. heart in love, trust, honor, and many more.

Then there are things that must be broken. The examples abound. Systems that inhibit creation of consistent quality, paradigms that continue to perpetuate more of the same only in different shape or form, problem solving approach to finding solutions that are not sustainable or effective; troubled relationships that are mended only to be troubled again, are just some of the 'habits' that we create during the course of our
